

Editorial (Volume 7, Number 1, 2015)

The essays brought together in this Volume are eclectic, but signal. Africa is in the throes of conflicts. Reflective engagement is often not directed where they should be, especially as the challenges of modernity suggests that one move on, without much attention to what are the variegated factors that predetermine one's present predicament. The essays brought together in this Volume are stimulants to engage those who might be willing to look at the same issue from various perspectives and generate insights that may otherwise be elusive. Caribbean Journal of Philosophy – CJP will continue in the tradition of foregrounding the capacity of its readers to be discerning in their engagement of ideas and issues which may otherwise be opaque and refractive. By so doing, it is hoped that our efforts shall not be in vain.
